INTRODUCTION TO PROPERTY LAW

1. INTRODUCTION TO PROPERTY & PERSONAL PROPERTY

Property is an interest in a group of interests that is legally protected. The rights possessed are not absolute and are controlled by whom it shall pass on the death of the owner or on liquidation of the firm (company).

- It involves the physical and legal control of property under the law.
- It is a right in rem in a physical object, as when the owner of a piece of land (landlord) transfers it to a tenant (tenant) and the tenant (tenant) transfers it to a sub-tenant (sub-tenant).
- It is a right in rem in a physical object, as when the owner of a piece of land (landlord) transfers it to a tenant (tenant) and the tenant (tenant) transfers it to a sub-tenant (sub-tenant).

A. KINDS OF PROPERTY

Tangible and Intangible

Tangible property has a physical presence (land, goods, etc.) while intangible property does not. Examples of intangible property are a bank certificate, a promissory note, and a deed, each of which is a right which is not confined to a particular person but which has legal effect and is enforceable against the world.

The same distinction is the basis of bailment and mortgage. If the goods are tangible property, the bailor must have the goods in his possession. If the goods are intangible property, the bailor must have the goods in his possession. However, the bailor must have the goods in his possession. The same distinction is the basis of bailment and mortgage. If the goods are tangible property, the bailor must have the goods in his possession. If the goods are intangible property, the bailor must have the goods in his possession.

Real and Personal

Real property is land or an interest in land. Personal property is everything that is not real property. The distinction is not always clear. For example, a house is real property, but a house with a mortgage is personal property. The distinction is not always clear. For example, a house is real property, but a house with a mortgage is personal property.

NOTE: See Section 148 of the Indian Contract Act.
